Thousands of water bears stranded on the Moon after Lunar Lander crash

By Mindy Weisberger

When you look up at the moon, there may now be a few thousand water bears looking back at you.

The Israeli spacecraft Beresheet crashed into the moon during a failed landing attempt on April 11. In doing so, it may have strewn the lunar surface with thousands of dehydrated tardigrades, Wired reported.

Beresheet was a robotic lander. Though it didn't transport astronauts, it carried human DNA samples, along with the aforementioned tardigrades and 30 million very small digitized pages of information about human society and culture. However, it's unknown if the archive — and the water bears — survived the explosive impact when Beresheet crashed, according to Wired. [8 Reasons Why We Love Tardigrades]

The tardigrades and the human DNA were late additions to the mission, added just a few weeks before Beresheet launched on Feb. 21. Much like Cretaceous fossils locked in amber, the DNA samples and tardigrades were sealed in a resin layer protecting the DVD-size lunar library, while thousands more tardigrades were poured onto the sticky tape that held the archive in place, Wired reported.

But why send tardigrades to the moon? Tardigrades, also known as moss piglets, are microscopic creatures measuring between 0.002 and 0.05 inches (0.05 to 1.2 millimeters) long. They have endearingly tubby bodies and eight legs tipped with tiny “hands”; but tardigrades are just as well-known for their near-indestructibility as they are for their unbearable cuteness.

Tardigrades can survive conditions that would be deadly to any other form of life, weathering temperature extremes of minus 328 degrees Fahrenheit (minus 200 degrees Celsius) to more than 300 F (149 C). They also handily survive exposure to the radiation and vacuum of space.

Another tardigrade superpower is their ability to dehydrate their bodies into a state known as a “tun.” They retract their heads and legs, expel the water from their bodies and shrivel up into a tiny ball — and scientists have found that tardigrades can revive from this dehydrated state after 10 years or more.

In other words, if any creature were capable of surviving a crash-landing in space, it would probably be a tardigrade. Whether any of the Beresheet tardigrades are biding their time in a lunar impact crater until they can be resuscitated, only time will tell.

Artificial 'tongue' could help tackle the counterfeit alcohol trade, scientists say

By Dianne Apen-Sadler

An artificial 'tongue' which can taste subtle differences between drams of whisky could help tackle the counterfeit alcohol trade, scientists say.

Engineers have built a tiny taster which exploits the properties of gold and aluminium to test differences between the spirits.

The technology is capable of picking up on the subtler distinctions between the same brand aged in different barrels, with more than 99 per cent accuracy.

It is also able to tell the difference between spirits aged for 12, 15 and 18 years.

Alasdair Clark, of the University of Glasgow's School of Engineering, said: 'We call this an artificial tongue because it acts similarly to a human tongue - like us, it can't identify the individual chemicals which make coffee taste different to apple juice but it can easily tell the difference between these complex chemical mixtures.'

'We're not the first researchers to make an artificial tongue, but we're the first to make a single artificial tongue that uses two different types of nanoscale metal 'tastebuds', which provides more information about the 'taste' of each sample and allows a faster and more accurate response.'

'While we've focused on whisky in this experiment, the artificial tongue could easily be used to 'taste' virtually any liquid, which means it could be used for a wide variety of applications.'

Dr Clark added: 'In addition to its obvious potential for use in identifying counterfeit alcohols, it could be used in food safety testing, quality control, security - really any area where a portable, reusable method of tasting would be useful.'

Drops of cartilage tissue could be injected into the knees

New treatment may ease creaky joints avoiding replacement surgery

By Rodger Dobson

Tiny balls of cartilage tissue bide that stick to the bone like raindrops on a windowpane could help heal painful knees.

Cartilage cells are injected into the knee joint, where, over time, they grow into new cartilage, cushioning the joint, easing pain and improving movement.

The method is designed to repair defects to the cartilage in the knee in patients with symptoms such as pain and problems moving the knee, and is used where the affected area is no larger than 10cm². Left untreated, defects can grow larger, leading to arthritis.

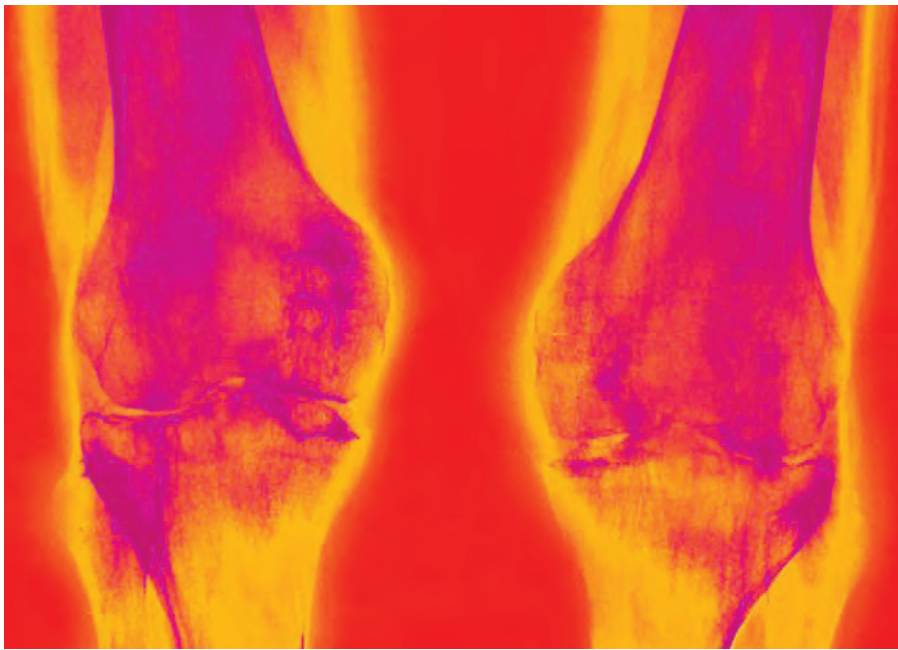

Research shows that the treatment, using the patient's own cartilage cells, is highly effective, even in young patients, who are increasingly undergoing joint replacement surgery.

This is partly due to advances in new joints that mean they last longer, so doctors are more willing to use them on younger people.

The most common form of arthritis, osteoarthritis, is caused by wear and tear of the cartilage that helps our joints take the strain of bending, lifting, gripping and kneeling, and affects almost nine million Britons.

Knee arthritis is particularly common, and 10 per cent of men and 13 per cent of women aged over 60 have creaky, painful knees.

Treatments range from pain-killers to knee replacements. One procedure, called microfracture, involves drilling small holes through the surface of the bone near the damaged cartilage.

The blood from the holes is rich in stem cells — 'master' cells that can turn into other cell types as a 'repair kit' for the body.

With microfracture, the stem cells form new cartilage, but it is unstructured and less hard-wearing than normal cartilage and does not last as long.

The new treatment is designed to repair the damage with strong and durable cartilage before it worsens. In the procedure, a small piece of cartilage is taken from the patient's knee using arthroscopy (a type of keyhole surgery).

The cartilage cells are then sent to Germany, where, over a period of seven weeks, the chondrocytes — the cells in healthy cartilage that give it its structure — are isolated and multiplied in the laboratory.

The purified chondrocytes naturally clump together to form spheroids, or spherical balls. These are then loaded into a syringe and injected into the knee, where they stick to the bone and form new cartilage. The new tissue combines with any remaining healthy cartilage, producing a strong repair.

Up to 10cm² of damaged cartilage can be treated. Using a treatment generated from the patient's own cells means that it should not be rejected by their immune system.

Research reported in the Orthopaedic Journal of Sports Medicine looked at whether the therapy was effective. The study, involving 71 teenage patients at Heidelberg University in Germany and other centres, showed it to be highly effective at easing pain and improving movement.
